Bacteriocin - Wikipedia

Microcins are less than 20 kDa in size, colicin-like bacteriocins are 20 to 90 kDa in size and tailocins or so-called high-molecular weight bacteriocins which are multi-subunit bacteriocins that resemble the tails of bacteriophages. This size classification also coincides with genetic, structural and functional similarities.

Bacteriocins have been widely studied in Gram-positive (lantibiotics, pediocin-like bacteriocins) and Gram-negative bacteria (colicins, microcins). However, it is becoming increasingly apparent that bacteriocin production is widespread in nature, including in the archaea, which produce similar defense proteins, the archaeocins. Bacteriocins can differ significantly both in size and in

The biology of bacteriocins. Bacteriocins were first identified almost 100 years ago as a heat-labile product present in cultures of Escherichia coli V and toxic to E. coli S and were given the name of colicin to identify the producing species (Gratia 1925).

Antibacterial activities of bacteriocins: application in ... Class I bacteriocins are further subdivided into lantibiotics, such as linear peptide nisin and globular peptide mersacidin (Chatterjee et al., 1992), labyrinthopeptins, such as globular peptide labyrinthopeptin A2 (Meindl et al., 2010), and sacitibiotics, such as globular peptide subtilosin A (Kawulka et al., 2004).
